Most of the people in our society generally have the opinion that violence on television increases aggression in children and adolescents. Does it? Who is to say whether the television has positively direct effect or a positive correlation? However, the majority of the people who have researched this topic have discovered that violence on television indeed one of the prime factors contributing to the increase in violent and aggressive behaviour among the youth in society. That is to say that there has been a growth of strong evidence to suggest that television violence does play an important and contributory part in learning of aggression. In other words, violence in the media helps promote and encourage children and adolescents to freely express their abusive behaviour.

Children are born ready to imitate adult behaviour because much of the human behaviour is learned by observing another person's behaviour. When a child grows up and starts watching Television, he cannot distinguish between what is reality and what is fantasy. In the minds of young children television is a source of entirely factual information regarding how the world works.
